AUTHORS

Anna Esenova is a master's student in the Cultural Anthropology Program at the European University at St. Petersburg, Russia. Her research interests include the anthropology of physicality, sports and ballet studies, and medical anthropology.

Zhanar Kadyrbek is a doctoral candidate at the L. N. Gumilyov Eurasian National University (Astana, Kazakhstan), where she is working on her dissertation titled "Contemporary Trends and Specific Features of Migration Processes in Central Asia." She serves as chief expert in the Department of Socioeconomic Analysis at the Institute of Public Policy of the AMANAT Party. Her research interests include interdisciplinary studies at the intersection of the sociology of medicine, migration studies, and labor relations in the context of digitalization. She pays particular attention to irregular labor migration and emerging forms of employment, including the platform economy, as well as their socioeconomic consequences for receiving societies.

Julia Khan received her PhD in social anthropology from Seoul National University (South Korea) in 2024. Her doctoral research examined how state schools in post-Soviet Kazakhstan institutionally adapt to new psychological discourses and theories of child-rearing. She is currently an independent researcher and an active member of the European Network of Psychological Anthropology (ENPA). Previously, she led a research group working on a project at the Corporate Foundation "El Umiti" and was also a member of the BRIF Research Group (Kazakhstan). Her research interests include post-Soviet education, psychology and culture, theories of personality and emotions, as well as medical and psychological anthropology.

Mariam Mirzoyan is a sociologist and research fellow at the Territorial Studies and Development Lab at Yerevan State University (Armenia). Her research explores bordering communities, everyday experiences of (in)security, and the production of space in post-Soviet contexts, with a focus on qualitative and narrative methodologies. She is actively involved in academic and applied research projects investigating social transformation and place-based change in Armenia.

Dmitry Timoshkin received his PhD in sociology in 2023 from Pacific National University (Khabarovsk, Russia). He is a visiting expert in the Faculty of Sociology and Anthropology, Thammasat University (Bangkok, Thailand), where he studies digital platforms used by Russian-speaking migrants in Thailand. He also teaches sociology of the media and research methods at the Humanities Institute of Siberian Federal University (Krasnoyarsk, Russia). His research focuses on the impact of social media on migration processes in Siberia, including migration motivations and decision-making. He has published on migrant localities in Siberian cities and on the role of collective memory in post-Soviet conflicts over the right to a city.

Sabina Shaimerdenova received her MA in sociology from the L. N. Gumilyov Eurasian National University (Astana, Kazakhstan). She heads the Department of Sociological Research at the Research Center "Youth." Her research interests include the sociology of professions, medical sociology, and the methodology of social research. She conducts both qualitative and quantitative studies, combining fieldwork with statistical analysis. Currently she is engaged in applied social research focusing on youth and medical professionals.

Asiya Sheri received her MA in sociology from the L. N. Gumilyov Eurasian National University (Astana, Kazakhstan) in 2025. Her master's thesis examined the emotional strategies of extremist propaganda in the media sphere. Her research interests include media studies, digital society, everyday practices, and identity. She previously participated in the preparation of analytical reports based on sociological research at the Research Center "Youth" and the Kazakhstan Institute of Public Development. She is currently working on a project focused on cross-border everyday life and language practices in border regions.

Harutyun Vermishyan has headed the Chair of Theory and History of Sociology at Yerevan State University since 2017 and the Territorial Studies and Development Lab since 2024. His research explores ideological and cultural transformations of urban space and, more broadly, the (re)production of place and social identities in postsocialist settings, ranging from contested borderlands and insecurity to everyday urban change. With over 20 years of academic and expert experience, he works with qualitative sociological methodologies and comparative analysis of spatial transformations.
