

AUTHORS

Aireen Grace Andai is a graduate student in political philosophy and a researcher at the Center for Comparative Studies on Toleration and Recognition at the Ural Federal University. She is a citizen of the Philippines, where she obtained a degree in sociology and credits in demography at the University of the Philippines. She has engaged in demographic and sociological empirical research in the fields of rural development, community-based participatory action research, and gender studies in the Global South. Her recent research interests are in the fields of urban spaces, international relations, ethics, and biopolitics.

Anastasia Beliaeva graduated from the Department of Philosophy at Moscow State University and received her PhD in philosophy in 2008. In 2017 she received a master's degree in social anthropology. She is currently Associate Professor of Philosophy at the Pirogov Russian National Research Medical University in Moscow. Presently, she is working in the fields of medical anthropology and social history of Soviet and post-Soviet medicine. Her interests include changing constructions of illness, the body, and medical knowledge in post-Soviet Russia. The research project she is now working on focuses on vegetovascular dystonia as a Soviet culturally constructed illness. Her most recent publication documents the history of this illness in Soviet medicine ("The Case of Vegetovascular Dystonia: Inventing the Most Common Soviet Disease," forthcoming in 2019 in Canadian Slavonic Papers).

Zhanna Chernova is Professor in the Department of Sociology, National Research University–Higher School of Economics, Saint Petersburg. Her research interests are related to the study of family policy in Russia and Europe. She is currently involved in a number of projects on the well-being of children left without parental care, foster parenthood, and the life trajectories of orphanage graduates in Russia. She is the author of scores of articles and books about family policy, gender relations, and family practices.

Meri Kulmala received her PhD in sociology from the University of Helsinki, Finland. She currently works as a university researcher and research coordinator at the Helsinki Inequality Initiative (INEQ), a multidisciplinary platform that brings together academics from different departments of the University of Helsinki studying the causes and consequences of intersecting inequalities. For more than a decade Kulmala worked at the University of Helsinki's Aleksanteri Institute on issues relating to Russia and social welfare. She is currently leading an international interdisciplinary research project on child welfare reform in Russia and is involved in a University of Helsinki project exploring youth well-being in the Arctic region. She has published internationally on Russian social policy and NGOs.

Galina Orlova is a social researcher with broad interdisciplinary interests in discursive studies, technosocial history of Russia, cultural studies, digital qualitative studies, and the epistemology of the social sciences. In 1999 she defended her dissertation in social psychology, devoted to Russian bureaucratic discourse of the nineteenth century. She has been working in Obninsk in the field of social nuclear research, nuclear history, and nuclear ethnography since 2012. She is currently completing the monograph (in Russian) Critical Assemblage: The City, People, and Atoms during Late Socialism.

Maria Sakaeva holds a candidate of sciences degree in sociology, having defended her dissertation at the National Research University–Higher School of Economics in Moscow in 2015. She currently works as a senior researcher and a senior lecturer at Ukhta State Technical University. Her research interests focus on everyday legality for entrepreneurs and the rule of law in business. She is the author of articles on the phenomenon of moonlighting politicians, informal relations in business, and property rights in post-Soviet Russia.

Larisa Shpakovskaya is a PhD candidate in sociology and Associate Professor in the Department of Sociology at the National Research University–Higher School of Economics, Saint Petersburg. Her research interests are in the fields of educational policy, social inequality, parenthood, and childhood in Russia. Together with Meri Kulmala and Zhanna Chernova Shpakovskaya is conducting research on reforms to the child welfare system, foster parenthood, and the life trajectories of graduates of orphanages and foster children. She is the author of several articles on parenthood, family, social inequality, and education.

Ilya Utekhin received his PhD in 2000 from the Russian Academy of Sciences, Institute of Anthropology and Ethnology (Moscow). He is Professor and Head of the Department of Anthropology at the European University at St. Petersburg. He studies communicative interaction and, particularly, human-computer interaction. He also works in visual anthropology and is the founder of an IT startup. He is the author of a classic study of the everyday life in Soviet and post-Soviet communal apartments Essays on the Communal Living (in Russian; OGI, 2001) and A Virtual Museum of Soviet Everyday Life.

Liliia Zemnukhova defended her PhD dissertation in sociology in 2013 at the Sociological Institute of the Russian Academy of Sciences at Saint Petersburg. Currently she is a Senior Research Fellow at the Sociological Institute of the Russian Academy of Science, as well as a Research Fellow at the Center for Science and Technology Studies (STS Center) of the European University at St. Petersburg. Her current research focuses on sociotechnical barriers to the production and dissemination of information technologies and the use of digital technologies in social research. In addition to these topics, she has published research devoted to various aspects of the Russian-speaking professional community of IT specialists.