

AUTHORS

Elizaveta Belkina is the impact education coordinator at the Skoll Centre, Saïd Business School, University of Oxford. Holding a master's degree in comparative and international education from the University of Oxford, she studies universities' and students' academic freedom. Her 2022 dissertation explored the challenges and complexities of undergraduate students' academic freedom in Russia.

Dmitry Dubrovskiy holds a PhD in history and is currently a faculty member at the Faculty of Social Sciences, Charles University in Prague. He graduated from the Faculty of History at Saint Petersburg State University and from the European University at St. Petersburg. He has taught human rights courses at the Faculty of Liberal Arts and Sciences of Saint Petersburg State University, Columbia University, and HSE University in Moscow and Saint Petersburg. His main areas of research are academic rights and freedoms, as well as limitations on freedom of speech. After Russia invaded Ukraine in 2022, he left Russia and was designated by the Russian government as a "foreign agent."

Ksenia Fedosova defended her PhD dissertation in folklore studies in 2007 in the Department of Philology at Lomonosov Moscow State University. Since then she has continued researching oral history, folklore, and ethnography of the Russian North and the Russian-Ukrainian borderland, as well as local traditions of Russians in Siberia. At present, Fedosova is involved in projects investigating the development of rural museums, works at the Foundation "Electronic Encyclopedia of History and Culture of Russian Villages and Hamlets," and supervises annual expeditions to rural settlements in the Russian heartland. She has published numerous articles on folklore, historical memory, and fieldwork methodology.

Ivan Kislenko defended his doctoral dissertation, "The Idea of Global Sociology in the International Sociological Agenda: Unity and Diversity of Interpretations," and obtained double PhD degree in sociology from HSE University and Ghent University in 2022. He has authored several articles, the most notable among them are "Between North and South: Decolonial Isolationism of Russian Social Science in the State of War and Beyond" in European Societies and "Debates on Global Sociology: 'Unity and Diversity' of Interpretations" in The American Sociologist. His research areas include global social theory, studies of social sciences and humanities, as well as sociology of sociology, education, and science.

Tatiana Kuksa received her master's degree in philology in 2018 from the Centre for Typological and Semiotic Folklore Studies of the Russian State University for the Humanities (RSUH) and a specialist law degree in 2001 from HSE University. Since 2001 she has been involved in expert and analytical support of federal legislative and executive bodies, as well as coordination of applied scientific research in the field of state governance, technical regulation, state control and supervision, computerization, optimization, and regulation of federal agencies. Since 2017, as part of her master's and doctoral research (at the Institute of Ethnology and Anthropology of the Russian Academy of Sciences), Kuksa has been researching modern obstetrics and motherhood. She has authored several books and academic articles.

Alexander Osipov is a board member of the International Centre for Ethnic and Linguistic Diversity Studies in Prague. Currently his research interests include ethnic and racial discrimination, ethnicity-based autonomy, diaspora issues, and ethno-cultural diversity policies. Among his publications are Institutional Legacies of Communism: Change and Continuities in Minority Protection (2013; coedited with Karl Cordell and Timofey Agarin) and Policies of Ethno-Cultural Diversity Management in Belarus, Moldova and Ukraine: Between Soviet Legacies and European Standards (2014; in Russian; coauthored with Nikolai Bepamiatnykh et al.).

Lidia Yatluk graduated from the European University in St. Petersburg in 2015. She is currently completing her PhD dissertation at the University of Groningen as part of the SCOOP project on cooperative sustainability research. Her current research focuses on the emerging phenomenon of decentralized science from the perspective of organizational research and science and technology studies. Yatluk has authored articles on the application of virtual reality to learning, academic entrepreneurship, and academic freedom. She is a member of the European Association of Organizational Researchers (EGOS) and Society for Social Studies of Science (4S).